

Every mask you wear was once a solution that worked.

The brain wants coherence.

A state where things make sense and nothing feels like a threat.

When something shatters
that, parents fighting, danger,
too much at once, it
scrambles for a way back.

Whatever works gets stored:
crying so the yelling stops,
performing so you stay safe,
disappearing so you're not a target.

It worked once.

So the body wired it in as a road back to calm.

Twenty years later you're still running it.

The mask that saved the child is now running the man.

It isn't broken.

It's outdated, still solving a problem that ended a long time ago.

You don't fight the mask.
You thank it, and show the body it's finally safe to set it down.
